Biography

NPR White House correspondent Tamara Keith is the co-host of the NPR Politics podcast - the top political news podcast in America. Keith joined NPR in 2009 as a Business Reporter on topics spanning the business world, from policy debates to technology trends. Serving as the White House correspondent for NPR since 2014, she chronicled the final years of the Obama administration, covered Hillary Clinton's failed bid for president, and documented the Trump administration. Keith is a sought-after speaker for events with groups including the National Association of State Retirement Administrators, Stable Value Investment Association, Johns Hopkins University, and many others.

Keith serves on the board of the White House Correspondents' Association and is the association's president through the middle of 2023. Her mission for the year of her presidency is to demystify the White House beat for the public, in an effort to help restore trust in the press, an essential pillar of American democracy. She also serves on advisory boards for the University of California Center for Free Speech and Civic Engagement and the UC Berkeley J-School. Keith consistently receives glowing reviews for her events, such as: "It was honestly one of our best events (probably our best). She received a standing ovation and I've received non-stop kudos to and for her. Fantastic." (Drury University)

You are to be commended for the delivery of your most dynamic and informative effort. As the President of the White House Correspondents Association, your unique vantage point provides an excellent perspective as applicable to the inner workings of being in the White House Press Corps. Further, with experiences on Air Force One and Air Force Two and with your proximity to the highest levels of our government, you made your answers and insights all the more powerful. Your responsiveness to questions was dynamic, focused and thorough.
